

Dr. Alexandru Cernat is a lecturer in Social Statistics at the University of Manchester. Previously he was a Research Associate at the Cathie Marsh Institute and the National Centre for Research Methods, University of Manchester where he investigated non-response in longitudinal studies with a special focus on biomarker data. He has received a PhD in survey methodology from the University of Essex working on the topic of mixed mode designs in longitudinal studies. His research interests are: latent variable modelling, measurement error, design and analysis of longitudinal data, new forms of survey data.