Description of the course
Constitutional law can no longer be understood as the law that regulates the governmental structure of the nation-state. Its scope has extended to cover the institutions that have emerged at the international and supranational level to deal with problems that arise in a globalized world. Constitutional theory needs to be adjusted and refined when we move from the nation-state to these new structures. The aim of this course is to think about constitutional law and constitutional theory in the context of globalization. We will consider issues such as these: the possibility and limits of democracy and justice at the global level; the constitutional status of the United Nations; the increasing fragmentation of international law; the interactions between regional supranational organizations and domestic constitutional law; the forms of adjudication at the international level; the problem of secession. In addition, domestic constitutional law has taken a comparative turn in the recent decades. Discussions about constitutional matters in a given polity usually take into account the experiences of other countries. Some frameworks of constitutional analysis, moreover, have acquired an almost universal status, such as the principle of proportionality in the field of fundamental rights. This move towards comparative law raises interesting issues that we need to consider in this course as well.
