Catalonia, Iberia and Europe

Can Iberian Studies contribute to the political and cultural debate on European integration? What does the ongoing Catalan crisis teach us about the impact of regional and national claims for self-determination on the European project? And, finally, how both Iberian Studies and the Catalan crisis contribute to the rethinking of the European integration process? The recent events in Catalonia have brought to light the very European question regarding the creation and consolidation of a multi/transcultural political community, opening thus the path to consider the Iberian Peninsula as a microcosm of Europe, as well as the ideal laboratory to explore different solutions to the problem of coexistence of several national entities within the same political organization.

Contributions by Silvio Berardi, Sérgio Campos Matos, David Duarte, André Pestre, Joseba Gabilondo, Nicolò Inchea, Gabriel Magalhães, Victor Martínez-Gil, Thomas Jeffrey Miley, Matteo Antonio Napolitano, Robert Patrick Newcomb, Anna Pirozzoli, José Miguel Sardica, César Rina Simón, Giangiacomo Vale

David Duarte has a PhD degree in Philosophy from the University Jean Moulin Lyon 3. He is a researcher in European Studies who questions the making of collective identities and, on this issue, he published Le récit de l'Europe: pour un imaginaire politique européen (L'Harmattan, 2017). He taught Political Philosophy at the Institute of Political Studies - Lyon and Political Science at the University Lumière Lyon 2.
